I am Sally Ndung'u, IPPNW regional vice president for Africa and vice chair of the international board of directors. I joined IPPNW as a medical student six years ago. I am currently working as a medical officer here in Kenya while pursuing a master's degree in public health.

As a member of the international organizing committee of the XXIII IPPNW World Congress, themed 'Disarmament, development and health,' and member of the Kenyan IPPNW affiliate, I wholeheartedly welcome you to Mombasa, Kenya for the very first IPPNW world congress in Africa!

I am excited to host an international forum on Kenyan soil to discuss global health and security and the important role of the African community in solving these issues. It will be a great platform for everyone to learn and strategize on the relationship between different forms and stages of conflict and climate change and how this influences our overall health and survival. Many of the sustainable development goals will be addressed directly or indirectly during this congress.

I look forward to seeing you in Mombasa, the country where there is no trouble 'Hakuna matata'.
